THE PROGRAM

The University of Copenhagen is Denmark's largest institution, welcoming over 37,000 students each year, including more than 1,300 international students. Located in the capital city of Denmark, students have access to a myriad of cafes, museums, historical sights and cultural attractions. The University has an urban, decentralized campus that is built into the fabric of the city, and is an ideal location for students who seek greater independence. With eight faculties, students can select courses from a wide array of academic disciplines.

The University of Copenhagen recently merged with The Royal Veterinary and Agricultural University and formed a new faculty, the Department of Life Sciences, to offer cutting-edge academic options in the fields of agricultural studies. The Department of Life Sciences boasts of one of the best food science programs in Europe and offers strong programs in biotechnology, horticulture, and plant science. In addition, there are a number of greenhouses and research laboratories, three research farms, and an arboretum. These faculties play an important educational role, providing opportunities for practical and field research.
